

Strength-Based Parent Profile

A practical worksheet to understand how your child learns best

How to Use: Be specific. Real examples beat general answers. This becomes your foundation for conversations with educators and support teams.

1. Getting to Know Your Child

Three words that describe your child

What makes your child unique

A moment you felt especially proud of them

What you enjoy most about your child

2. Interests & Passions

Activities that make your child “light up”

What they choose to do in their free time

Creative or expressive interests (art, music, building, etc.)

Topics they naturally gravitate toward

3. Learning & Thinking Strengths

What your child learns quickly or easily

How they approach problem-solving (examples help)

Preferred learning style

- ■ Visual
- ■ Hands-on
- ■ Verbal
- ■ Independent
- ■ Collaborative

Tools, routines, or environments that help them succeed

Subjects or skills they feel confident in

4. Physical Strengths & Energy

Physical activities they enjoy or excel in

Strengths in coordination, stamina, or movement

How they prefer to move or engage physically

Environments where they seem most energized

5. Social & Emotional Strengths

How your child shows empathy or kindness

Strengths in relationships (leadership, listening, cooperation)

How they make or maintain friendships

What helps them feel safe, supported, and confident

How they express emotions in healthy ways

6. Resilience & Independence

Examples of persistence or not giving up

What helps them recover from frustration or setbacks

Times they've shown independence or responsibility

What motivates them to keep going

7. Family Strengths & Support

Values or strengths emphasized at home

How your family supports learning and growth

Ways you'd like to partner with teachers or support staff

8. Hopes & Goals

Your hopes for your child this year

Strengths you want to build on

Anything else that would help others support your child

Final Note: Use this profile to guide conversations so your child is seen for who they are—not just what they struggle with.
